The idea of putting your spirit or energy into cooking (or other things) is a common idea in Japanese culture. Whether you believe there's something mystical happening or it's just a metaphor for concentration and focus is kind of up to you. I think the message you can take away is like you get out of it what you put into it.

The Gospel of John places the story of Jesus' action in the temple toward the beginning of Jesus' public activity, while the other Gospels place it toward the end. This might seem like a simple case of three against one, and thus easily settled. In actuality, since Matthew and Luke follow Mark's structure, it is a case of Mark versus John.
